TRANSFORMATION, TRANSGRESSIONS, AND TRUST IN EUROPE AND AMERICA

The only consistency of today's world is change, often in many directions, unpredictable and triggered by self-determination on different levels, political and natural events, cultural reassessment as well as global affairs. Individuals, states, and regions are constantly engaged in transformation processes. Societies are thus permanently changing. While some countries undergo complex transformations towards more democratic and participatory forms of government, others have to re-adjust their political and social models to cope with new challenges. Demographic change in Western Europe and Northern America, the need for young and well educated immigration and a re-thinking of societal coherence in times of diversity have become key policy issues and social, cultural and political challenges of our times. Nation-building and ever-deeper forms of economic and political integration retrace and dilute borders with immense impact. Globalization reflects a broader more idiosyncratic process of economic development. At the household level, this transformation affects the individuals' choices in human capital investment and reproductive decisions. Europe and Northern America are faced with unprecedented demographic changes. Social change and fundamental transformation processes are mostly achieved through transgressions of existing rules and the status-quo. Such processes often lead to more inclusive and democratic societies, as was the case when transgressions resulted in the abolition of slavery, or the acceptance of human rights and inclusion of disenfranchised groups. Thus, societal norms were reframed from illegal to legal, from unacceptable to acceptable. Trust plays a very important role in terms of how and whether we accept social change as a challenge or a threat. Depending on our level of confidence, transformation processes will be accepted as inevitable, or strongly opposed as a threat of the status quo. Today, Europe and America can be seen as facing a crisis of trust on individual and collective levels.

The summer school will offer the possibility of examining the current debate on transformation, transgressions, and trust in Europe and America by focusing on the current challenges to established forms of government, welfare policies and modes of participation in a radically changed global world, where migration and transnationalism play an important role. Focusing on the emphasis areas of the University of Graz – South Eastern Europe and North, Central and South America – this will provide a basis for an interdisciplinary analysis in terms of opportunities provided and challenges faced in the past, present and future.
